Hunr is inspired by minimalism, practicality and sustainability, We want to revive a time when furniture was considered an heirloom, in this age of disposability we want to create furniture that can be passed down generations and retain a classic and timeless aesthetic.

We at hunr believe that not only should be sustainable but regenerative. One of our founders is a agriculturist and believes in organic agriculture and permaculture practices.

We consistently plant native species of trees in sindh and source all our wood from plantations which are replenished since it is a source of income for people, we strictly use local wood types, such as Neem, Acacia, Albezia, Eucalyptus, Rosewood, Java plum and so forth.

The reason this wood is not used is because the local carpenters doubt its strength, which is based on misinformation. When treated right, all these wood types have the ability to live through the decades.

India is one of the biggest exporters of Mango-wood all around the world and there are industries built around Mango-wood.

Another factor is carbon sequestration, if not used in furniture it will likely be sold as firewood, releasing a huge amount of carbon into the air which otherwise would be locked up in the wood as a piece of furniture.
